

Personalised advertising - it's your choice

Independent, quality original journalism needs your support.
Please choose an option.

Accept personalised advertising and all cookies

We use cookies and similar technologies to support the Guardian and personalise your experience in other ways. To do this we work with a cross section of 139 partners.

or

Reject all and subscribe to Guardian Ad-Lite for €5 per month

Read the Guardian website without personalised advertising. This does not include ad-free. You will still see non-personalised advertising and we may still use cookies and similar technologies to improve our site.

Some cookies are necessary to help our website work properly and can't be switched off. Find out more in our privacy policy and cookie policy, and manage the choices available to you at any time by going to 'Privacy settings' at the bottom of any page.

Cookies and similar technologies collect information from your device and may be used to access personal data about you including page visits and IP addresses. We use this information about you, your device and your online interactions with us to provide, analyse and improve

Accept all

Reject all and subscribe

If you already have Guardian Ad-Lite or read the Guardian ad-free, sign in

These plans are stirring alarm among federal employees, with many warning that “politicizing” the civil service will hurt not just them, but also millions of Americans across the US by undermining how well the US government provides services and enforces regulations that protect the public.

Speaking about federal employees last month, the former president said: “They’re destroying this country. They’re crooked people, they’re dishonest people. They’re going to be held accountable.”